G. Bernard Shaw has never declared himself definitely on the worldwide question of love, but it is intimated that in "Pygmalion" he has established the fact that he believes every woman has a soul, and that it is more important to encourage and nourish her soul than it is to clothe her in diamonds and silks and satins, or to make her talk and look like a duchess. This romance in five acts is declared as full of emotional fire and the problems of heart interest as many plays by Henri Bernstein.
